The chief sat on the sofa, dressed in a crisp shirt and nice trousers. Chiefs usually dressed like businesspeople, never in feathers and hides. That’s in the movies. Chief Wimbe also loved his cat, which was black and white but had no name. In Malawi, only dogs are given names, I don’t know why. The cat was always in the chief’s lap, purring softly as the charo stroked its neck.

“Charo, Charo,” the farmer said, bending to one knee and gently clapping his hands as a sign of respect. “We have an issue that requires your intervention. The land you granted me fifteen years ago is being encroached upon by my brother’s son. I need you to help so there’s no bloodshed.”

“Very well,” the chief replied. “Let me think about this and carry out some research. Come back on Sunday and I’ll have an answer.”

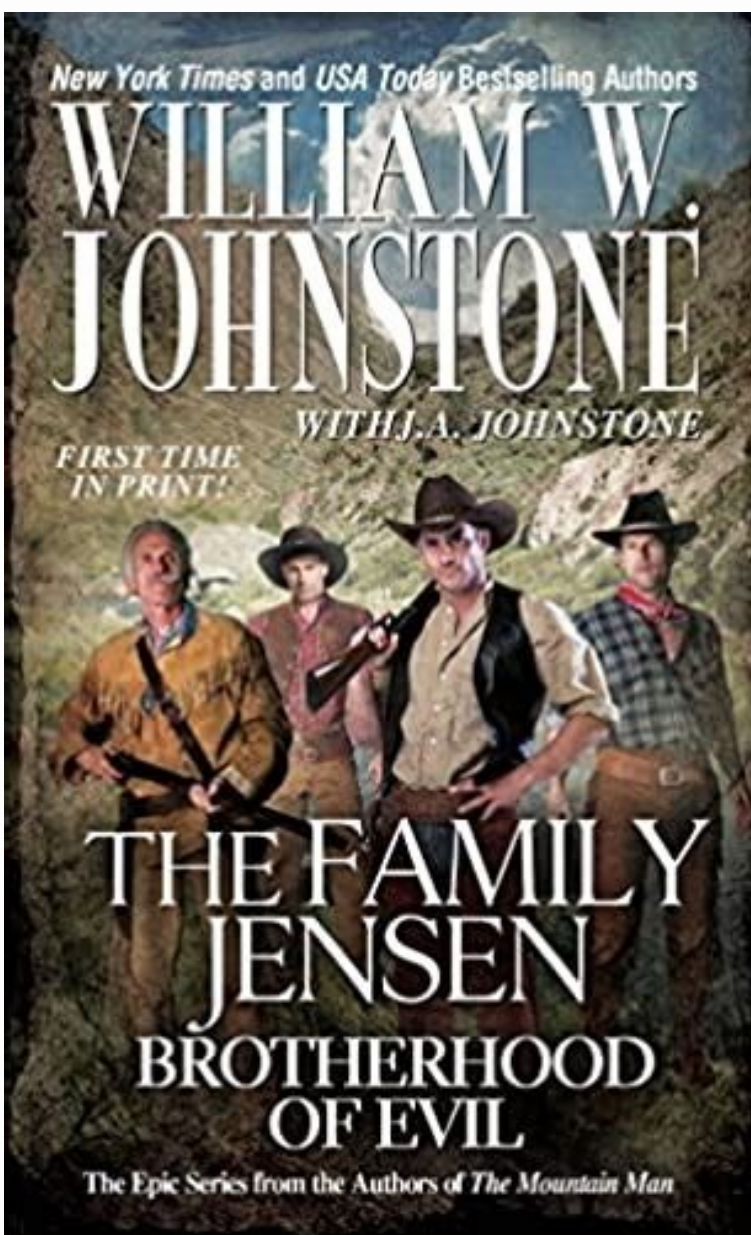

They always offered to take me to the hospital, but I said, "Don't worry, I'll put some duct tape on it."

Hiking in Glacier National Park is fun because the mountains are beautiful. You never know what you might see. Adonna, Phil, and

I were always looking for wildlife. Don't ever get too close to wild animals! A wild animal might attack if it feels you are a danger to its babies. It also might attack you to defend itself or its food. Phil and Adonna noticed this big, fresh pile of bear droppings on a trail.
